

THE TRUTH OF PAPAL CLAIMS

THE TRUTH OF PAPAL CLAIMS

BY

RAPHAEL MERRY DEL VAL, D.D.

Archbishop of Nicaea

A Reply to

THE VALIDITY OF PAPAL CLAIMS

BY

F. NUTCOMBE OXENHAM, D.D.

English Chaplain in Rome

ST. LOUIS, MO.

B. HERDER

17 SOUTH BROADWAY

LONDON: SANDS & COMPANY

1902

Imprimatur

HERBERT CARDINAL VAUGHAN

Archbishop of Westminster

CONTENTS

	PAGE
PREFACE - - - - -	ix
Correspondence in the Church Times —The reason of this book - - - - -	ix--xvi
INTRODUCTORY - - - - -	1
Methods of argument—The point at issue.

PART I

DOCTRINE OF THE SUPREMACY AND INFALLIBILITY - - -	9
The Supremacy—The Proof from Scripture—S. Peter in relation to the other Apostles—Difference between individual Bishops and individual Apostles—The Catholic Episcopate—Infallibility—What it means and what it does not mean—The Proof from Scrip- ture—De Maistre—The Bishops of Rome—The Founders and the Bishop—The Clementine Romance —The False Decretals - - - - -	9—32

PART II

THE VENERABLE FATHERS - - - - -	33
Maldonatus and Bellarmine—S. Augustine's Retracta- tions—S. John Chrysostom—S. Cyril of Alexandria	33—54

PART III

ARGUMENTS AGAINST THE SUPREMACY AND INFALLIBILITY 54

- “Ye shall be witnesses unto Me” (Acts I. 8)—The Election of S. Matthias—The Institution of Deacons—
 “They were sent” (Acts VIII.)—The conversion of Cornelius—The Council of Jerusalem—S. Paul rebukes S. Peter—The Epistles of S. Paul—The Epistles of S. Peter - - - - - 54—80

PART IV

THE CONSTANT BELIEF OF EVERY AGE - - - - 81

- The Popes not silent in the Early Ages—S. Victor and the Eastern Churches—S. Stephen and S. Cyprian—The Text of S. Irenaeus - - - - - 81—109

PART V

COUNCILS OF THE CHURCH - - - - - 110

- Necessity and Utility—The Council of Nicaea—The Sardican Canon—The Second General Council—The Council of Chalcedon and the Twenty-eighth Canon - - - - - 110—125

CONCLUSION

CATHOLIC ENGLAND - - - - - 126

- The Venerable Bede—The Bishops of the Province of Canterbury—The “Branch Theory”—Newman and the Fathers - - - - - 126—129

APPENDIX

INDEX

	PAGE
Introductory - - - - -	1
The Supremacy - - - - -	9
Infallibility - - - - -	17
The Bishops of Rome - - - - -	23
The Venerable Fathers - - - - -	33
Maldonatus - - - - -	36
Bellarmino - - - - -	41
S. Augustine - - - - -	44
S. John Chrysostom - - - - -	48
S. Cyril of Alexandria - - - - -	52
The Book of Acts - - - - -	54
S. Paul - - - - -	76
S. Peter's Epistles - - - - -	79
The Constant Belief of Every Age - - - - -	81
S. Victor - - - - -	93
S. Cyprian - - - - -	95
S. Irenaeus - - - - -	101
Councils of the Church - - - - -	110
The Council of Nicaea - - - - -	113
The Sardican Canon - - - - -	114
The Second General Council - - - - -	118
The Council of Chalcedon - - - - -	120
Conclusion - - - - -	126
Appendix

PREFACE

THE following correspondence appeared lately in the Church Times, and we publish it here, as explaining the reason of this little book :—

ROMAN WAYS IN CONTROVERSY.

Sir,—May I ask your courtesy for the publication of the following letter, which I have had occasion to write to a Roman priest, whose main occupation here in Rome appears to be to entice straying Anglicans into the Roman fold :—

18, Piazza del Popolo,
11th March, 1902.

Rev. Sir,—I am informed that you are preaching a course of sermons in adverse criticism of a small book which I published on “Papal Claims.” May I venture to express a hope that you will publish your criticisms in order that they may bear the test of examination, and, if necessary, of reply ?

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,

F. N. OXENHAM.

The Rev. Mons. Merry del Val.

P.S.—I reserve to myself the right of publishing this letter, together with any reply which you may think fit to make.

To this letter I have received no answer or acknowledgment.

I had reason, arguing from precedent, to suspect that Mons. Merry del Val would probably make statements in these sermons which he would not venture to publish; his silence goes far to confirm this suspicion.

It is not difficult to estimate the value of controversial statements which a preacher ventures to make to a select congregation, but which he does not venture to publish.

F. NUTCOMBE OXENHAM,
English Chaplain in Rome.

March 10th.

ROMAN METHODS OF CONTROVERSY.

Sir,—May I venture to trespass upon your valuable space and say a word in reference to a letter of Dr. Oxenham's which appeared in your issue of the 14th of March. It is a fact that on the 4th of March (not the 11th) Dr. Oxenham addressed to me the letter which he has published and that I have not replied.

I should have been glad to do so, though unacquainted with Dr. Oxenham, had he not added the postscript which appears at the foot of that letter. Without commenting upon the form and tone of what he has written, I would have replied that I was willing to consider the utility of publishing my lectures, in accordance with his request, though it is questionable that such a course could substantially add anything to the arguments and facts expounded so ably in the following works to which I refer Dr. Oxenham:—"St. Peter: his Name and his Office," by T. W. Allies; "The Catholic Claims," by Richardson; "History of my Religious Opinions," by J. H. Newman; "The Primitive Church and the See of Rome," by Luke Rivington; and "England and the Holy See," by Spencer Jones, one of Dr. Oxenham's brother clergymen, not to mention other writers. I might have added that if Dr. Oxenham would take pains to refer to authentic sources and to the original works of the Fathers and of Catholic theologians he would find a good deal to change in such astounding statements as the following, which are contained in his little book:—1. That the “ultramontane Jesuit doctor (Maldonatus) acknowledges (what every patristic scholar knows) that all those great doctors of antiquity, and among them three of the greatest—Origen, Chrysostom, and Augustine—every one of them differs from modern Romanists, and gives other interpretations to this famous text (Matt. xvi.), which other interpretations do not give any countenance to Papal claims” (pp. 26-27). And on page 32 Dr. Oxenham sums up his conclusion thus: “We saw just now how the Jesuit Maldonatus conclusively refutes the Papal assertions as to the first text on which they rely.” The italics are my own. Dr. Oxenham discreetly suppresses all that Maldonatus says of the testimony of those very same Fathers, and of many others, upon this text, and his explanation of how the various interpretations of this same text may be easily accepted and reconciled.

2. On page 33 Dr. Oxenham, quoting from Dr. Salmon, asserts that another Ultramontane Roman writer, Bellarmine, can quote nothing earlier than the eleventh century in support of the Catholic interpretation of the text in St. Luke xxii. 31-32, upon which Bellarmine hardly dwells, and he again discreetly suppresses Bellarmine’s numerous quotations from the early Fathers upon the Primacy of St. Peter and upon his relative position to the other Apostles. These are but samples of Dr. Oxenham’s methods of controversy and of the arguments which he uses to convince his guleless readers of the futility of Papal claims. They are methods which I will leave others to qualify, as they deserve. Much as I may differ from the Anglican position and consider it untenable, I can willingly acknowledge that those who defend it with honesty and ability (and there are many) do not resort to such questionable methods of controversy as those which Dr. Oxenham has adopted in his little book.

It was not my intention before, nor is it my intention now, to be dragged into a controversy in the press with Dr. Oxenham. I therefore refrained from answering his letter, for I could not do so in any form without acknowledging the right, which he assumed, of publishing any reply which I might have thought fit to make.

R. MERRY DEL VAL,
Archbishop of Nicaea.

March 17th.

ROMAN WAYS IN CONTROVERSY.

Sir,—I was unwilling to disturb the quiet of Holy Week by taking any notice of Mons. Merry del Val's letter in your issue of March 21st; but now I beg leave, by your kind permission, to make a few remarks on that letter.

(1) I admit readily that I did, in my book on "Papal Claims," make both the "astounding statements" to which Mons. Merry del Val objects; and hereby I distinctly reassert both those statements, because both of them are simply true, as Mons. Merry del Val might easily satisfy himself, if he would take the trouble to consult those "original works" to which he is kind enough to refer me. Your readers may do the like.

(2) I admit, with equal readiness, that I did (to use Monsignor's phrase) "discreetly suppress" those portions of the writings of Maldonatus and of Bellarmine to which he refers.

I should not myself use, in this sense, the word "suppress," but I quite agree that it is "discreet" to omit making long quotations which have no bearing upon the particular point in question.

This was the simple and, I think, sufficient reason for both those omissions of which Mons. Merry del Val complains.

Let me make this clear to your readers.

In the first instance, my purpose was to show that the assertions made by the Vatican Council and by the present Pope with reference to the famous passage in St. Matt. xvi. 18, were not true, those statements being that the Papal interpretation of this passage was "the venerable and constant belief of every age," and that it was held and taught by "all the venerable Fathers." (The italics are mine.)

For this purpose I quoted the Jesuit Maldonatus, who admits that three of the greatest of "the venerable Fathers"—Origen, Chrysostom, Augustine—every one of them differ from this Papal interpretation and adopt other interpretations, which do not give any countenance to Papal claims. The case of St. Augustine (shall I say that Mons. Merry del Val "discreetly suppresses" it?) is particularly strong, because, as I have shown in "Papal Claims" (pp. 27-28), St. Augustine in his younger days had interpreted "this rock" to mean St. Peter; but in a book which he wrote some years later ("Retractions," Book 1, cap. 21) he says he thinks the interpretation which he once gave, mistaken, and that "this rock" means Christ Himself. If the interpretation, which St. Augustine first gave, had been, as the Vatican Council declares that it was, the "constant belief of every age," it is inconceivable that St. Augustine should have thus quietly put it aside and adopted another interpretation.

Now if three of the greatest of "the venerable Fathers" did not hold or teach the Papal interpretation of this text, it is plainly false to assert that they "all" did so hold and teach.

That was my only point, and I repeat that what Maldonatus says as to Origen, Chrysostom, and Augustine, does "conclusively refute" the Papal assertions as to this text.

"All that Maldonatus says of the testimony of those very same Fathers and of many others," which Mons. Merry del Val accuses me of having "discreetly suppressed," is nihil ad rem.

No doubt Maldonatus quotes "many others" who agree with the Papal interpretation; and, of course, he thinks St. Augustine and the rest, who disagree, mistaken; and he tries to make out that they could not really have meant to differ from the Papal view. That is so, no doubt, and I make Mons. Merry del Val a present of that admission, if he cares to have it.

In the second instance of my "discreet suppressions" my point was to show that what Mons. Merry del Val is pleased to call "the Catholic interpretation" of the text in St. Luke xxii. 31-32, was not "the venerable and constant belief of every age." For this purpose I referred to the statement of "a recent learned writer" (Dr. Salmon, "The Infallibility of the Church," p. 344) who asserts that Bellarmine "can quote nothing earlier than the eleventh century" in support of this "Catholic interpretation" of this text. If nothing earlier than the eleventh century can be found in support of this so-called "Catholic interpretation," it is plainly false to assert that it was "the constant belief of every age." That was my only point; and it was proved. That Bellarmine makes "numerous quotations from the early Fathers upon the primacy of St. Peter, and upon his relative position to the other Apostles," is no doubt quite true. And it is equally true that I have "discreetly suppressed"—i.e., not recited—any of those numerous quotations, because they were nihil ad rem.

PREFACE

xv

These are the two instances which Mons. Merry del Val selects as illustrating my "questionable methods of controversy," and he gently intimates that there is some lack of "ability and honesty" therein. My method (at least so far as intention goes) has been to keep strictly to the exact point in question and to try to prove it, and not to endeavour to mislead unwary readers by going off on to side issues and trying to make capital out of them when you know that you have no case as to the main point at issue—e.g., when you are discussing whether three particular writers did, or did not, make certain statements, and when you know perfectly well that they did make those statements, you should not attempt to divert attention by complaining that you have not been told what "many other" writers have said on the same, or a similar, subject.

The method which I have adopted appears to me to have the merit of "honesty," however much it may lack "ability"; whereas, in the other method, although there is great scope for "ability," there is not much room for "honesty." A suspicion that something of this latter method might have crept into the Mousignor's sermons in criticism of my little book was my reason for wishing that he would publish those sermons. I gather from his letter to you that probably these sermons will be "discreetly suppressed."

Here I take my leave of Monsignor Merry del Val, "Archbishop of Nicaea," of which venerable diocese he has about as much rightful claim to be the Archbishop as I have.

F. NUTCOMBE OXENHAM.

18, Piazza del Popolo, Rome, Easter Monday.

[We have allowed Mr. Oxenham his right of reply, but it is quite impossible to continue this controversy.—ED.]

The reader will find in these pages the substance of five lectures delivered in Rome at the beginning of this year. They formed part of a whole series on various subjects, and they were addressed to converts.

FEAST OF THE SEVEN DOLOURS, 1902.

INTRODUCTORY

It is never a pleasing task to have to deal with an opponent who delights in sophistry, but when a writer forgets his good manners and finds it necessary to couch his specious reasoning in terms which are offensive and discourteous, the task becomes more displeasing still. Dr. Oxenham, in his little book entitled "The Validity of Papal Claims"—a book in which he endeavours to reply to the Pope's Encyclical on the Unity of the Church—appears to revel in abusive epithets, and he accuses Leo XIII. of "deliberate mistranslations and forgeries," of "most presumptuous" and "profane impostures," just as on a previous occasion he did not hesitate to charge the venerable Pontiff with having uttered a "deliberate and audacious falsehood."¹ But abuse is not argument, and I fancy that most people will be inclined to suspect that his position must be a weak one if it requires such weapons for its defence.

The main point at issue, as Dr. Oxenham himself acknowledges in the opening chapters of his book, is no other than this:—Did S. Peter hold the privi- leges of supremacy and infallibility now claimed for him, and were those privileges recognised by all the venerable Fathers of antiquity, and by all the holy and orthodox Doctors of the Church, as the Vatican Council asserts, and the present Pontiff teaches in his Encyclical on the Unity of the Church, according to the divine promise of our Lord and Saviour given to the Prince of His Apostles?

¹ See Dr. Oxenham's Letter to the Guardian, Nov. 23, 1896.

1. Now, as regards Dr. Oxenham's manner of dealing with the subject, I must first point out that he seems to have experienced considerable difficulty when he came to translate the very simple text of the Vatican Council. No one in the least familiar with the terms of ecclesiastical language, or indeed with the etymology of words, would venture to translate "discipulorum principi" by "the wisest of His Apostles." And yet, this is the version as it appears on page 8 of Dr. Oxenham's little book. However, after he had printed his book, Dr. Oxenham discovered his mistake, and in the copy which I possess,¹ there is inserted a strip of paper with some Errata, and we are asked to read Prince instead of wisest. It is not easy to pass over the mistranslation as a printer's error, and we are led to wonder how far we can trust Dr. Oxenham's manner of handling the texts which he quotes, and whether he is in any way competent to pronounce upon a translation given by Leo XIII., whom he accuses of "deliberately falsifying" the testimony of one of the Fathers.¹

¹ A friend of mine has shown me a copy of Dr. Oxenham's book in which the correction does not appear.

2. Dr. Oxenham proceeds at once to abandon the main point at issue, mentioned above, and, after the manner of the hero of Cervantes, to combat an imaginary foe. He adds page to page in order to prove that the Vatican Council and the Pope were wrong in saying that which they never did say. For nowhere has the Council or the Pope asserted that all the venerable Fathers and orthodox doctors of the Church, at all times and on every occasion, even when dealing with a subject other than the supremacy of S. Peter, have expressly described or expounded at length the position of S. Peter, or that each one of the Fathers has been at pains to mention that doctrine every time that he may have had occasion to refer to one or other of the three famous texts quoted by Dr. Oxenham, viz.:—"Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven. And whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, it shall be bound also in Heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, it shall be loosed also in Heaven" (Matt. xvi. 18). "Simon, Simon, behold Satan has desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat. But I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not: and thou being once converted, confirm thy brethren" (Luke xxii. 31). "Feed my lambs. . . . Feed my sheep" (John xxi.).

¹ Pages 82-85.

We all know, and surely Dr. Oxenham cannot ignore the fact, that the Fathers often comment upon one same text in different ways, according to the particular doctrine with which they happen to be actually dealing, and that they frequently use the same text in support of several doctrines. Nor do they deny one of the doctrines because they are intent upon explaining another, and where there is no incompatibility between them. Now, I put it to the candid reader—Is it honest, is it fair, to quote the words of a Father in connection with one of the texts already mentioned, in a passage where that Father is not expressly discussing the supremacy of S. Peter, and perhaps only referring incidentally to this subject, and then, without allusion to all that the same Father has taught elsewhere, to conclude that he knew nothing of the supremacy of the great Apostle, and that the Pope is wrong in asserting that all the Fathers have acknowledged that doctrine? And yet this is Dr. Oxenham's method. Let me give an instance.

He discusses separately, I might almost say he dissects the three passages from Scripture above mentioned, and, with a flourish of trumpets, he professes to show that S. Chrysostom is not one of the "venerable Fathers" who taught the supremacy of S. Peter. He quotes a passage from one of that great doctor's homilies, in which, besides a number of other subjects, S. John Chrysostom comments upon the fall of S. Peter, and refers to the text: "Simon, Simon . . . I have prayed for thee"; and Dr. Oxenham concludes triumphantly with these words—"How entirely impossible would such a commentary as this be in the mouth of a modern Papalist! How entirely fatal to modern Papal claims in regard to this text is such a commentary in the writings of S. Chrysostom."¹ I intend dealing more fully, further on, with Dr. Oxenham's daring assertions in regard to the teaching of Chrysostom, and I shall show how Dr. Oxenham has suppressed the evidence connected with the point at issue, which is contained even in the very homily to which he refers us. But I would ask here—What right has he, in the name of sheer honesty, to present S. John Chrysostom to his readers in this way, in opposition to the Pope's assertion, without a word upon what that great doctor says upon the position of S. Peter? What right has he thus to leave his readers under the impression that S. John Chrysostom cannot be quoted as one of the venerable Fathers who taught the supremacy of S. Peter; which, as we have said, is the real point at issue? What would Dr. Oxenham say if I were to argue that he admits Papal claims, by quoting some words of his at the end of his book without mentioning what is evident from all that he has written? By such a method, and with the help of sophistry of this kind, one might assert that Scripture denies the existence of God, and then turn upon a critic with the question—Does the Scripture say, or does it not say, that “There is no God”? Undoubtedly it does, but where? and when? and how?

¹ Pages 34, 35.

3. Before a writer attempts to contradict a teaching, from whatever source it may proceed, it is essential that he should ascertain what that teaching really is, for otherwise he must inevitably employ his energies in beating the air. Now, Dr. Oxenham, when he comes to discuss the doctrine of S. Peter’s infallibility, reveals the fact that he has not even understood the doctrine which he endeavours to overturn. On page 32, he comments upon the text of S. Luke xxii., and he writes as follows:—“Now, if these words of our Lord did indeed promise to S. Peter that he should be infallible and supreme, as we are told by the present Pope that He did, it is strange that shortly after this promise S. Peter should three times have actually denied his Lord—this did not look like infallibility.” To say nothing of the fact that the Pope does not even mention that text on pp. 38, 39 of his Encyclical, as Dr. Oxenham declares that he does, his remarks suffice to show that Dr. Oxenham imagines, like so many other Protestants, that the Catholic doctrine of the infallibility of S. Peter and of his successors implies impeccability, which no Pope, no Council, no Catholic theologian ever dreamt of asserting. And Dr. Oxenham brings his mistake (should I say ignorance?) into further prominence when he speaks of the discussion between S. Peter and S. Paul, recorded in the epistle to the Galatians, and in regard to which, on page 58, he says—"For whether S. Peter's fault on this occasion were one 'of faith' or 'of fact,' whether his fault were 'light and venial' or not, the fact remains that he was in the wrong, that S. Paul withstood him before the Church, and openly rebuked him." If Dr. Oxenham had taken pains to find out what is really claimed for S. Peter and his successors by the Vatican Council and by the present Pope, and what Catholics mean by infallibility, he might have avoided stumbling into a blunder which does away with so many of his arguments.

4. Finally, we must place on record that Dr. Oxenham employs a method of controversy which he himself declares to be unfair. For on page 44 he writes as follows:—"It would not be fair to cite any of those passages in the life of S. Peter which are recorded in the Gospels, because it might be urged that our Lord did not confer on S. Peter his great privileges until the close of His own earthly ministry." Yes, exactly so, it would not be fair, or reasonable, as obviously S. Peter did not receive his office until the close of our Lord's earthly ministry, and therefore not until after the denial.

But this method of arguing which Dr. Oxenham pronounces not to be fair is precisely the one which he adopts all through the first half of his little book! He constantly refers to S. Peter's fall as an argument against his supremacy and infallibility, and he constantly recalls the comments of the Fathers upon S. Peter's sin as fatal to Papal claims. When an author thus adopts a line of argument which he himself declares not to be fair, there is little left for his critics to add.

PAPAL CLAIMS

PART I

A BRIEF STATEMENT OF THE DOCTRINE OF THE SUPREMACY AND INFALLIBILITY OF S. PETER

1—The Supremacy

POPE LEO XIII.'s Encyclical on the Unity of the Church explains the Catholic doctrine of S. Peter's supremacy so clearly and so forcibly, that my readers have but to peruse it to convince themselves that Dr. Oxenham's assertions, to the effect that "the teaching of Scripture is plainly inconsistent with the truth of such a doctrine,"¹ and that the texts quoted by Catholics in support of that doctrine "each and all fail to declare, or even indeed, to allude to, any such doctrines,"² are undoubtedly bold assertions, but assertions that are contrary to fact. I will therefore only give a summary of the doctrine of S. Peter's supremacy and infallibility, but I will do so sufficiently to show, I trust, how little Dr. Oxenham understands the position which he endeavours to contradict, and how futile are his arguments.

¹Page 16.

²Page 40.

The two chief texts of Holy Scripture from which the Catholic teaching is drawn by the Vatican Council, by the present Pope, by the Fathers, and by our theologians, are the following:—1. "THOU ART KEPHAS (ROCK), AND UPON THIS KEPHAS (ROCK) I WILL BUILD MY CHURCH, AND THE GATES OF HELL SHALL NOT PREVAIL AGAINST IT. AND I WILL GIVE TO THEE THE KEYS OF THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN. AND WHATSOEVER THOU SHALT BIND UPON EARTH, IT SHALL BE BOUND ALSO IN HEAVEN; AND WHATSOEVER THOU SHALT LOOSE ON EARTH, IT SHALL BE LOOSED ALSO IN HEAVEN" (MATT. XVI.). 2. "FEED MY LAMBS . . . FEED MY SHEEP" (JOHN XXI.). Three times our Lord gave this charge to Peter, and we cannot fail to note the progression, for He first speaks of the lambs, and then of the sheep in the most solemn manner. The text of S. Luke xxii., "SIMON, SIMON, BEHOLD SATAN HATH DESIRED TO HAVE YOU . . . BUT I HAVE PRAYED FOR THEE THAT THY FAITH FAIL NOT: AND THOU BEING ONCE CONVERTED, CONFIRM THY BRETHREN," significant as it is in the light of the two other texts, is often, though not always, quoted, and can be quoted in support of the same doctrines, but rather as cumulative evidence, together with other texts concerning S. Peter. Neither the Vatican Council nor the present Pope have said that this text of S. Luke, especially when taken separately from the other two, was never used by the Fathers to further emphasise some of Christ's teaching on other points of doctrine; and many "modern Romanists," as Dr. Oxenham would call them, very often hardly stop to dwell upon the text of S. Luke, after having proved S. Peter's position on the strength of what is said in the Gospels of S. Matthew and of S. John.¹

Undoubtedly S. Luke's words are of great significance when taken in connection with the two most important texts already mentioned. I say in connection with those texts; for if we are to know what Scripture teaches us upon any subject we must consider all the texts that refer to that subject, and place them side by side, and in true harmony one with another. We shall thus be in a position to gauge their exact meaning and significance, since a teaching may not always be found fully expounded in one text. If we proceed, as Dr. Oxenham proceeds, to cut up the texts, there are many unquestionable and unquestioned doctrines of the Christian Faith which could not be proved by Holy Writ. When our Lord says, for instance: "I and the Father are one," if I follow the lines of Dr. Oxenham's argument against the supremacy of S. Peter, I might say that this text makes no reference to the Holy Ghost, and that the Fathers who have commented upon it, and spoken only of the Son, knew nothing of the existence of a third Person in the Blessed Trinity.

¹The Dogmatic Constitution of the Vatican Council rests chiefly, not to say entirely, upon the texts of S. Matthew and S. John, and only quotes the passage from S. Luke as further evidence on behalf of the same doctrine. (See Appendix.)

Now, with these texts before us, we hold, in union with the Vatican Council, that the Church, typified by Christ as an EDIFICE, as a KINGDOM, as a FOLD, rests upon S. Peter as a building rests upon its foundation, that it is ruled by S. Peter, to whom "the keys of the kingdom of heaven" were given, that it is led and provided with proper food by S. Peter, to whom the care of the whole flock was committed; a care which, our Lord says, was to be extended to the sheep as well as to the lambs, to the chief members of the flock, therefore, as well as to those who are dependent upon them. If the metaphors chosen by Christ Himself mean anything¹—and will Dr. Oxenham dare to assert that they mean little or nothing?—they must signify what we have just explained, and, accordingly, as we shall have occasion to point out, all the Fathers and Doctors of the Church have held this doctrine of S. Peter's supremacy, which, let us remember, is the matter at issue. We must not tire of recalling this in the face of Dr. Oxenham's evasions.

First, then, if Christ, the Divine Founder of the Church, the Corner-stone and Rock of the EDIFICE, the Divine Head and Ruler of the KINGDOM of heaven, the Divine Shepherd of the FLOCK, bestows separately and individually upon one of His disciples His own title, and calls him the Rock of the EDIFICE here on earth; if He grants to that disciple the special powers of the RULER, by handing to him the Keys; if He, as the Divine Shepherd, on the eve of His Ascension, commits the care of His whole FLOCK to that particular disciple, with the powers of ruling (ποιμαίνειν) and of feeding (βδσκειν)—what, I ask, can be more evident than that Christ is here constituting an Office which is part of the very constitution of His Church, the necessary condition of Its stability, and of Its strength, and of Its unity? The Rock which is to sustain the edifice as the foundation upon which Christ builds must be essential to the whole construction. The Ruler who has the Keys must be indispensable to the whole kingdom. The Shepherd who is to govern and feed the whole flock of Christ cannot be absent from that flock, if it be really His. Does not all this imply universal jurisdiction, and a jurisdiction which Christ Himself has given, and which is therefore not an ecclesiastical development, but a Divine institution? Is “the teaching of Scripture plainly inconsistent with the truth of such a doctrine”? And do these texts “each and all fail to declare, or even to allude to, any such doctrine,” as Dr. Oxenham asserts that they do?

Secondly. “What is needed is evidence to prove that S. Peter was on a wholly different footing from all the other Apostles, as the Pope, in the right of heritage, claims to be on a wholly different footing from all other Bishops.” So writes Dr. Oxenham on page 24 of his book. Is not that evidence already clearly put before us in the texts above quoted? For on which of the Apostles did our Lord confer, in this most special way, the office and powers of the Rock, of the Ruler, of the Shepherd? To S. Peter alone and separately many things were given; whilst the other Apostles received nothing without him.¹ One alone can exercise the power which he received; their powers can be exercised by many. Their powers do not include his; but his powers include theirs. The Church was "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief corner-stone," to use S. Paul's words in his Epistle to the Ephesians.² But amongst the Apostles, one is chosen to whom special prerogatives are given. The Church is built upon the Apostles, but upon the Apostles as Christ ranked them, with their Prince at their head, who is endowed by Him with special prerogatives. Accordingly S. Paul speaks of the Apostles collectively, and he couples them with the Prophets, as authorised teachers of Divine truth. In doing so, S. Paul does not exclude but includes Peter, with whatever powers Christ gave him.

All the Apostles received a universal mission directly from Christ, nor had any one of them to apply to Peter for a mandate or for authority, though their authority was bound up with, and dependent upon his own special supremacy. Dr. Oxenham is not aware of this, it would seem, or that this is the teaching of "modern Romanists"; and he is strangely led to argue off the point by quoting S. Paul's words to the elders of Ephesus: "Feed the Church of God which He hath purchased with His own blood,"¹ and the words of S. Peter, who exhorts his fellow-elders to "feed the flock of God,"² for the Pope to-day exhorts Bishops to feed the Church of God, namely, that portion of the Church which is committed to their care, but not independently of him nor of his own office over the whole flock. And, thirdly, there is a difference, a great difference, between individual Apostles and individual Bishops, though, as regards mission and authority, there is no difference between the Apostles, taken collectively, and the body of the Catholic Episcopate. The personal prerogatives of the Apostles, considered individually, ceased necessarily with their mortal career, because they were personal. But the prerogatives of the Apostolic Office in Peter could not cease with his life, because that Apostolic Office in him was not merely personal, but was established by Christ as an essential and necessarily enduring element in the very constitution of the Church. Hence that special Office must last as long as the Church herself remains, namely, to the end of time. The body of the Catholic Bishops, that is to say, the Catholic Episcopate, succeeds to the College of the Apostles, and is therefore supreme and infallible, but the Catholic Episcopate includes the Bishop who is pre-eminently the Bishop of Christ's fold, just as the College of the Apostles included the Prince of the Apostles, with each and all of his own personal prerogatives and powers.

¹ The power of binding and loosing was given to all the Apostles, including Peter, but to Peter alone and separately the power was especially given with the keys. See Appendix, Origin.

² ii. 20.

¹ Acts xx. 28.

² 1 Peter v. 2.

The Apostolic Office therefore remains in the Church, in the person of S. Peter's successor, and in the Catholic Episcopate when united to its Divinely constituted Head, the Rock of the whole edifice; for without him there can be no Catholic Episcopate and no succession from the Apostles, according to the mind of Christ. And thus it is not correct to say, as Dr. Oxenham says, that "All Bishops alike are successors of S. Peter as an Apostle."¹

Nor are the Bishops mere delegates of the Roman Pontiff. This idea is expressly repudiated and condemned by the Church. The Bishops have power and jurisdiction in their own right, for "the Holy Ghost hath placed" them "to rule (feed) the Church of God,"² and accordingly the Pope, the Chief Bishop, addresses them as his "venerable brethren." But the actual exercise of that power and jurisdiction which the Bishops hold from God is, by the will of God, united with, and dependent upon, the Apostolic Office, centred and living in the Rock, the chief Ruler, the Chief Shepherd of the whole flock. Hence, he it is who determines the particular portion of the whole flock over which each Bishop is to exercise the powers which he has from the Holy Ghost, because, unlike the individual Apostles, the individual Bishop has not received from God a universal mission in the world,—though even individual Apostles, by their personal gift of universal mission, could not be independent from their Divinely-constituted Head and Prince. A remnant of this principle may be found in the Anglican Church by law Established, in which the Crown, holding jurisdiction over the whole community, names the Bishop in each diocese, and therefore determines the limits within which he is to exercise his powers. The Crown has been substituted for the successor of S. Peter.

¹ Page 13.

² Acts xx. 28.

2—Infallibility

The doctrine of the Infallibility of S. Peter and of his successors consists in this, and in this only, that by the special assistance of the Holy Spirit, Who, according to our Lord's promise, is with the Church unto the end of time, the successors of S. Peter inviolably keep and faithfully expound the revelation or deposit of faith delivered through the Apostles. Hence, that when, in the exercise of his Apostolic Office, the successor of Peter speaks as the Chief Shepherd of the whole flock, and expressly declares by what is called a DEFINITION, which he makes known as such, that a doctrine is a revealed doctrine and part of the deposit of the Christian Faith, then, he will not and cannot fall into error. We speak of it as a definition of doctrine regarding FAITH OR MORALS, because the Christian Faith is not merely a speculative doctrine, or system of philosophy, but also, and pre-eminently, a practical one, and it must therefore extend to determine what is a sin and what is not a sin, that is to say, what is contrary to God's Commandments and what is in conformity with those Commandments. And this is the meaning of the term MORALS. It is obvious, then, that in all cases it is a question of doctrine: either of doctrine concerning Christian belief for the Christian mind, or of doctrine concerning the Christian observance of God's Commandments.

Hence Dr. Oxenham may learn, that by Infallibility we do not mean "impeccability" or sinlessness in the person of S. Peter or of his successors, who are accountable to God for their own consciences and their own lives like every other human being; that we do not mean that the Roman Pontiff receives special revelations from heaven, or that by a revelation of the Holy Spirit he may invent or teach new doctrines not contained in the deposit of Faith, though, when occasion offers, and especially in times of conflict, he may define a point which all have not clearly recognised in that Faith, or which some may be striving to put out of view. Nor do we mean that every utterance that proceeds from the Pope's mouth, or from the Pope's pen, is infallible because it is his. Great as our filial duty of reverence is towards whatever he may say, great as our duty of obedience must be to the guidance of the Chief Shepherd, we do not hold that every word of his is infallible, or that he must always be right. Much less do we dream of teaching that he is infallible, or in any degree superior to other men, when he speaks on matters that are scientific, or historical, or political, or that he may not make mistakes of judgment in dealing with contemporary events, with men and things.

Now, upon what grounds do we rest our belief in this prerogative of infallibility thus explained? The answer is: Upon the same grounds as we assert our belief in the supremacy. The infallibility follows necessarily from the supremacy. For, what is the mission of the Church? What is the Church in the world for? To teach the Divinely revealed truth and whatsoever Christ has taught. But how could the Office of S. Peter be instituted by Christ as the Rock of that Church, as the ground of stability in the Divine edifice, if this Rock could be shaken or split up by errors in matters of Faith? How could the edifice stand if that were so? To admit such a possibility is tantamount to saying that our Lord's promise can fail, and that "the gates (powers) of hell," of the father of lies, shall "prevail" against the Church. The Ruler of the Kingdom of heaven would no longer hold the Keys of that kingdom, if he could open the gateways of error and close the door of revealed truth. The Shepherd would not be feeding the sheep and the lambs with the food of truth, if he could slay them with the poison of erroneous doctrines.

Dr. Oxenham must also learn, together with other Protestants, that we hold all the Apostles to have been infallible, and that they had not to gather from S. Peter the truth which they had been sent to teach. But this infallibility of theirs was their personal prerogative, because it was not given in any other form, and it ceased with their personal mission. Whereas the infallibility of S. Peter, because it was not only personal, but also part of the Office which is essential to the construction of the Church, as the Rock is essential to the edifice which is built upon it, must remain in that Office as long as the Church abides. Nor is it admissible that the supremacy and infallibility of S. Peter depend upon the acceptance or approval of those who were committed to his care to be sustained, to be governed, and to be fed. For the Church was not established after the manner of a Parliament, and if the Rock, the Ruler, and the Shepherd were to be dependent upon the votes or the approval of those who are committed to his care,¹ the whole principle and constitution of the Church established by Christ would be overturned, and the Rock would rest on the edifice, not the edifice upon the Rock; the Keys would be in the hands of the subjects, and not under the control of the Ruler; the flock would feed the Shepherd, instead of the Shepherd feeding the flock. Rightly then, and consistently with the texts above mentioned, may the text of S. Luke be quoted to further emphasise the doctrine of the supremacy and infallibility of S. Peter, and it is thus quoted by many of the Fathers, by the Vatican Council, by the present Pope, and by not a few of our theologians: "And thou being once converted, confirm thy brethren."

¹ Dr. Oxenham tells us on page 58 of his book that the judgment of the Council of Jerusalem was afterwards endorsed by universal acceptance.

Let me conclude this paragraph on the infallibility of S. Peter and of his successors, by recalling an argument in its support, which has been so ably suggested by Count J. de Maistre.¹ Once you admit the supremacy, the infallibility follows as a necessary consequence. We have here two different terms which practically signify the same thing. For surely in real life, and as far as the practical conduct of men is concerned, to be free from error and to be above all possible accusation of error, come practically to one and the same thing. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that no Divine promise had been made to S. Peter and to those who succeed him as the Rock of the Church, the Pope would nevertheless be practically infallible, or, what is the same thing, he would have to be considered so, as being the ultimate tribunal which admits of no appeal. Let the reader reflect, and he will realise that in every social organisation or commonwealth, under any form of government, the judgment of a court that admits of no further appeal is, and must be assumed to be, just and true. It is because that court is supposed to be unerring that it admits of no further appeal, though, of course, not having any Divine assurance, that court in reality may err. Had anyone the right to say that the Pope, who, by virtue of his supremacy, is the ultimate court of appeal in matters of faith, is mistaken, that person would also have the right to disobey him, and this right to disobey him would put an end to the supremacy. For, as we have said, why does a supreme court admit of no appeal if not on the assumption, which is practically enforced, that its judgment is based upon truth, and therefore just? Hence it is that practical infallibility is always asserted as a necessity for the government of every organised society. Surely, then, it must be obvious that in the Church, in the Kingdom of Christ on earth, where the question is not one of mere outward compliance with the law, or of practical government, but one of binding our consciences, of telling us what God wishes us to believe or not believe, surely, I say it must be obvious that infallibility should exist in the Office of the supreme judge, and an infallibility which is not based only upon a necessary assumption for practical purposes, but upon an unassailable and divinely established principle beyond the possibility of mistake. Again, if Christ wished unity of faith to abide in His Church, and He certainly did, He must have provided the proper means of preserving that unity under ordinary and habitual circumstances. A general Council of the whole Episcopate, especially as the Church extends her frontiers, can only be an intermittent and extraordinary means of infallibly proclaiming the truth. We have but to recall the inevitable difficulties which have invariably attended the meetings of every Œcumenical Council in order to realise this. If the personal infallibility of the Chief Shepherd is not admitted, we must conclude that Christ has willed the unity of His Church and yet left her without the means of practically maintaining and preserving it.

¹ Du Pape, BK. I. c. 1, p. 21.

3—The Bishops of Rome

We have dealt with two of the three questions which Dr. Oxenham sets himself to answer on page 12 of his book. We shall have to deal with them again. But we must now turn to the third question which, Dr. Oxenham tells us, involves the double inquiry: (1) "Was it as Bishop of Rome that S. Peter held . . . his prerogatives of supremacy and infallibility? Why are we to suppose that these two 'excellent gifts' were given to him as Bishop of Rome, and not as an Apostle? But if S. Peter did not hold these prerogatives as Bishop of Rome, why should Bishops of Rome, any more than any other Bishops, succeed to those prerogatives? All Bishops alike are successors of S. Peter as an Apostle. (2) And secondly it must be inquired, Was S. Peter ever Bishop of Rome? ”¹

As regards the first question, I should like to point out that Dr. Oxenham has put it into a strange form, so strange that one almost feels inclined to ask him whether he is aware that it was in Cesarea Philippi, and by the Sea of Tiberias, that our Lord spoke to Peter, years before there was any question of his coming to Rome or anywhere else, and that it was in Palestine, and not in Italy, that our Lord lived and conferred powers and prerogatives upon his Apostles. Of course, Dr. Oxenham is aware of this. Then why put such a question? The answer to it, when it is thus worded, is very obvious. Most certainly it was as an apostle that S. Peter received his excellent gifts, yet not as one of the other Apostles, but as their Prince. We have already sufficiently explained this, as the reader may see. Dr. Oxenham appears to attach more importance to the locality than to the office. The successor of S. Peter in his Apostolic and Episcopal office, with whatever special and essential prerogatives were attached to that office, can be no other than the Bishop who succeeded him in the See which he occupied at the time of his death. Had S. Peter died when he was at Antioch, the Bishops of

¹ Pages 12-13.

Antioch, and not the Bishops of Rome, would have been his successors, and Dr. Oxenham might have called us "Antiochists" instead of "Romanists."

When Dr. Oxenham asks: "Why are we to suppose that these two excellent gifts were given to him (Peter) as Bishop of Rome and not as an Apostle?"—the answer is a very simple one. We are not to suppose any such thing, because S. Peter received those gifts long before he ever set foot in Rome, and as Prince of the Apostles. But he left them to his successors as Bishops of Rome, because it was in Rome that he died, and that he left his office, his episcopate, and its prerogatives.

There remains then only the second point of Dr. Oxenham's double inquiry, which he expresses as follows:—"Was S. Peter ever Bishop of Rome? For, if not, the Popes, as Bishops of Rome, are not his successors at all!"¹ I presume that Dr. Oxenham does not intend to question the historical fact of the presence and death of S. Peter in Rome, a fact which all scholars, Catholic and non-Catholic, admit to-day as unquestionable. I need only remind Dr. Oxenham that Lightfoot, Ellicott, Farrar, Westcott, and Gore, Wieseler, Harnack, Hilgenfeld, Renan, Thiersch, and Ewald all acknowledge it as unassailable,² and that Lanciani, speaking as an archæologist, declares that it is "established beyond a shadow of doubt by purely monumental evidence.”¹ Let us then consider Dr. Oxenham’s question: Was S. Peter ever Bishop of Rome? He replies to it, but in a most perfunctory and superficial manner, on page 108 of his book. We shall have to deal presently with his assertions and arguments put forward in the preceding pages in connection with the text of S. Irenaeus, the General Councils, etc., where he endeavours to show that “it was not the necessities . . . of their position only” which gave the Bishops of Rome their eminence and distinction among other Bishops, but that “it was a matter of express decree, agreed upon by the other Bishops.” Here, however, we are concerned only with the question as Dr. Oxenham puts it: Was S. Peter ever Bishop of Rome? The subject is interesting, and for the student of history, a very extensive one, which requires a long and critical examination of evidence. Many modern scholars have discussed it fully, and when Dr. Oxenham consents to take notice of, and to discuss, the existing documents and to reply to the powerful arguments brought forward by recent research,² then it will be time enough for me to reply to Dr. Oxenham on this point, as fully as the subject deserves. All I need do here is to deal with what he writes in the hope of convincing his readers that S. Peter was not Bishop of Rome, and to sketch the main arguments in support of the Catholic and Roman tradition.

¹ Page 13.

² See S. Peter in Rome, by A. S. Barnes.

¹ Pagan and Christian Rome, p. 123.

² Grisar Die Papste des Mittelalters.—Chapman: Revue Bénédictine, 2 Feb., 1895. Duchesne: Les Origines Chrétiennes. Michels: L’Origine de l’Episcopat. Rivington: The Primitive Church and the See of Rome.

1. The Apostles S. Peter and S. Paul were the FOUNDERS of the See of Rome, and accordingly our calendar, unlike the calendar of the Anglican Church, which only names S. Peter on the feast of June 29th, mentions that feast as the feast of both Apostles; and every Pope issues his most solemn documents with a reference to this glorious tradition. And Tertullian (200 A.D.), S. Cyprian's master, tells us that the Apostles Peter and Paul poured all doctrine (totam doctrinam) into that See,¹ and that Clement, Bishop of Rome, was ordained by S. Peter, though Tertullian by no means excludes the fact that Linus preceded Clement as bishop of that see. S. Peter arrived in Rome in the year 42 A.D., and founded and organised this Church, ordaining priests and deacons. During his temporary absence, the college of Roman priests, under his authority, governed the community. In the year 60 A.D. S. Paul came to Rome, as he had promised to do in his Epistle to the Romans. He was an Apostle, remember, with universal mission, as we have explained above. But S. Peter, as the Rock of the Church and first founder, remained as the first head and Bishop of the See of Rome. I presume that Dr. Oxenham would not attempt to say that there could be two bishops in one see, though it is quite conceivable and consistent with what we have said hitherto of the constitution of the Church that two Apostles should unite in the founding of one see, especially if it was to be the see of the Bishop who succeeded the Apostle and Bishop who was the Rock of the whole Church.

¹ De Præscr. Hæret. 32.

The historical evidence in support of these latter statements is chiefly to be found in the words of S. Clement (90 A.D.), in the words of S. Irenaeus (140-202 A.D.), not to mention other documents old enough to sweep away a number of Dr. Oxenham's arguments. In the earliest and subsequent literature the name of S. Paul is omitted in connection with the "bishopric" of Rome, though it is preserved in connection with the foundation of that see. Eusebius (264-338), for instance, indicates, as we do to-day, the two ways in which those two great Apostles were connected with the see of Rome. Linus, he says,¹ obtained the bishopric of the Church of Rome "first after Peter," and Clement held the "third place of those who acted as bishop after both Paul and Peter."² And in his Chronicle,³ Eusebius writes: "The Apostle Peter, when he had first founded the Church of Antioch, sets out for the City of Rome, and there preaches the gospel, and stays there as prelate of the Church for twenty years . . . but he (Peter), besides the Church of Antioch, also first presided over that in Rome until his death."

¹ H.E. iii. 4. ² iii. 21.

³ ii. 150. ὁ δὲ αὐτὸς μετὰ τῆς ἐν Ἀντιοχίᾳ ἐκκλησίας καὶ τῆς ἐν Ῥώμῃ πρώτος προέστη ἕως τελειώσεως αὐτοῦ.

2. Dr. Oxenham ventures to assert that the Clementine Romance,¹ "a pure fiction," is the origin of the story that S. Peter was Bishop of Rome. Now, this is absolutely contrary to fact: (1) Because before the Clementine Romance came into existence, we have the list of the Bishops of Rome made out by Hegesippus, a converted Jew, who came to Rome under Eleutherius, and who drew up that list from the lists already existing, and from the tradition which he found in his time. And again we have the list drawn up by S. Irenaeus and the testimony of Eusebius, which show that the Clementine Romance may have arisen from the previous tradition, but could not have given rise to it. (2) Because there is the famous Epistle of S. Clement, Bishop of Rome, to the Church in Corinth, an epistle described by Irenaeus as "most powerful," and by Dr. Lightfoot as "almost imperious." In that epistle, S. Clement claims divine authority for his right to intervene authoritatively in the dissensions at Corinth, and of calling the riotous faction to order. They are to obey, he says, "the things written by us through the Holy Spirit," and "if any disobey the things spoken by Him through us, let them know that they will involve ¹The Clementine Romance is made up of a narrative which relates how S. Clement met his relations whom he had lost (Recognitions), of certain homilies, and of a letter of S. Clement to S. James. Even Dr. Salmon, one of Dr. Oxenham's greatest authorities, cannot fix the date of the Romance earlier than the "very end of the second century." (Introduction to N. T., p. 14.) It was probably composed much later on in the third century.

themselves in transgression and no small peril." This letter was written during the lifetime of S. John the Apostle. It therefore indicates already at that early date the position and authority of the See of Peter. S. Clement claimed the obedience of the Corinthians. He claimed it from Rome, and it was given and order was restored. The importance and authority of this intervention on the part of the Bishop of Rome, who thus asserted his universal jurisdiction, may be gathered from the words of Denis, Bishop of Corinth, who some seventy years later writes, saying that this letter of S. Clement's was still publicly read in the churches of Corinth, on every Sunday. Nothing of all this could be based upon the Clementine Romance, but it is all remarkably in keeping with the teaching of the Vatican Council "that by the appointment of our Lord, the Roman Church possesses a superiority of ordinary power over all other Churches."¹ (3) Because the Clementine Romance, at all events taken as a whole, is, as Mr. Puller admits, "un-Petrine and un-Roman." Dr. Oxenham therefore must explain how this fiction which even places S. James above S. Peter can be the origin of Papal claims. (4) Because it is most improbable, not to say quite impossible, that men of the stamp of Tertullian and S. Cyprian should have based their ideas regarding the See of Peter upon a Romance. And S. Cyprian in a well-known passage speaks of the See of Rome as "the Chair of Peter and the principal Church whence sacerdotal unity took its rise."

¹ Cap. III. De vi et rat. Prim. Rom. Pont.

3. Dr. Oxenham points next to the Isidorian Decretals, as "the great foundation for the exorbitant claims advanced by the mediæval Popes,"¹ and adds that "the edifice of Papal claims . . . has been built up upon this forgery."² Well, Dr. Oxenham takes a big leap from the Clementine Romance to the ninth century, and omits to say anything of the documentary evidence supporting Papal claims during the interval of so many centuries previous to the publication of those Decretals. Perhaps this is one of the "important matters" which he felt bound to pass over.³ Then, why draw the "important" conclusion which is not supported by the premisses? We can afford, however, to take no notice of this omission. The Isidorian Decretals were composed in Western France, not in Rome, about the middle of the ninth century. And in reference to this question we could not do better than quote here what Father Clarke has written in an essay⁴ which Dr. Oxenham would do well to read, and from which he may learn much. "Happily," Father Clarke writes, "the False Decretals have had no such influence on the legislation of the Catholic Church. They have introduced no dogma, no law, no custom that did not

¹ Page 109.

² Page 110.

³ Page 108.

⁴ The False Decretals, by Father Clarke, S.J.

exist previously. They were never formally recognised by any of the Popes, and it can be proved with certainty that the Holy See knew nothing of them until years after they were compiled, much less had any sort of part in their compilation. If extracts from them occur in some Papal documents, we must remember that they were inserted in perfect good faith, for the authenticity of the False Decretals was widely credited, and at last was taken for granted at Rome itself. The False Decretals were drawn up, as we shall see presently, not in Rome, but in Western France. Their compiler was no member of the Papal Court, but a provincial Bishop, or some one acting under his orders and seeking to advance his cause. Though they go by the name of 'False Decretals,' yet a great portion of them are genuine documents, and those which are forgeries embody the traditional teaching of the Popes whose names are attached to them. They did not introduce even into the discipline of the Church anything that was unknown before, but simply sought to attach the weight of Papal or Conciliar authority to customs which generally prevailed, but which many questioned as lacking any sufficient sanction from the Holy See."

I would remark that for a forgery to be accepted, and to have "undisputed authority for some seven hundred years,"¹ it must indeed bear a great resemblance to truth, and reflect ideas that are prevalent, or it would deceive no one. And Dr. Oxenham will have to explain how the Isidorian Decretals could be generally welcomed if they did not express what was already a well-rooted belief.

¹ Dr. Salmon. The Infal. of the Church, p. 451.

PART II

1—The Venerable Fathers

COMMENTING upon a text taken from the writings of S. Cyril of Alexandria, Dr. Oxenham does not hesitate to assert that "at the beginning of the fifth century, the modern Roman doctrine of Papal supremacy was simply unknown."¹ I propose discussing separately the case of each of the great Fathers specially quoted by Dr. Oxenham. But without wearying my readers here with endless references in order to show how this assertion of Dr. Oxenham's is contrary to existing evidence, let me ask them to consider his statement in the light of the texts which I have gathered together in an Appendix to these pages, and they will see that centuries did not pass in the history of the Church "before any single person whose witness has come down to us, ever imagined such a doctrine,"² as Dr. Oxenham assures us was the case. "We need no evidence," he writes, "to show that S. Peter had the first place of honour, that he acted as leader and spokesman of the Apostles on several occasions, that he took the most prominent place more than once, that he was truly a 'pillar' of the Church, as also S. James and S. John are said to have been. No evidence which proves this is of the smallest value in this controversy, for all this is freely admitted."¹ It is very good of Dr. Oxenham to admit so much, though he fails to see that even in this admission he practically informs us that the Apostles were all the same, only different. But the texts which we have collected together, and those which we shall have occasion to mention in the course of our arguments, clearly show that the Fathers held S. Peter to be placed by Christ on a wholly different footing from all the other Apostles, because He had given to him all that they had and something more. The reader may judge for himself.

¹ Page 40.² Page 111.

Nobody needed evidence for what Dr. Oxenham so freely grants, and the Fathers least of all. Surely then, it is strange that they should have written so much to prove what nobody needed evidence to believe. The fact is that the Fathers taught a great deal more than Dr. Oxenham admits, and that they dwelt upon the position of S. Peter and his office in the constitution of the Church.

We have already explained how all the Apostles, including Peter, were the foundation of the Church, and how in that sense they were all "pillars." This is freely admitted by all who believe in the special office of S. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, the "pillar" amongst "pillars." One text from S. John Chrysostom's writings should suffice to open Dr. Oxenham's eyes. "Why then," exclaims that great Father, "did James receive the throne of Jerusalem? This is my answer—That He appointed this man (Peter), not teacher of that throne, but of the habitable world."¹ Mark the words teacher and throne and habitable world, and see what is left of Dr. Oxenham's theory. He admits that S. Peter was the "leader" of the Apostles. But the leader, for what? The Apostles were leaders and teachers and pillars. Undoubtedly, then, he who was the "leader" of those leaders, of those teachers, of those pillars, had a pre-eminent position as teacher and pillar, and, as the Rock of the whole edifice, a position which could only pass away with the Church, and which placed him and those in his office on a wholly different footing to the others. Could Dr. Oxenham have suggested anything more opposed to the spirit and mind of our Blessed Lord than to assign to S. Peter an empty "honour," a position of mere pomp and show, a vain title, a name without authority? Our Saviour never denied that a "first" amongst His disciples and in His kingdom there must be;

¹ Page 24.

¹ Hom. 88 in Joan: "Ὅτι τούτων οὐ τοῦ θρόνου, ἀλλὰ τῆς οἰκουμένης ἐχειροτόνησε διδάσκαλον.

He was emphatic as to the principle of authority and gave the "keys" to one; but He repudiated empty honours, vain titles, and first "places" in the Synagogue, as mere "places." He taught that the one who was to be first should act in all humility, following the Master's example, Who indeed was the Master, but acted as the servant of all. He emphasises this teaching when he speaks to Peter, and just as He was telling him that he should confirm his brethren, as if to remind him, more than the others, of the humility with which he should exercise the great authority of his pre-eminent position. And so is it that in conformity with this teaching, the successor of S. Peter calls himself "the Servant of the servants of God." But of mere supremacy of "place" and of "honour," our Lord would have nothing, and nowhere perhaps is that brought out more clearly than in the twenty-second chapter of the Gospel of S. Luke, where our Lord tells us that He prayed so especially for Peter.

2—Maldonatus and Bellarmine

1. In his second letter to the Church Times,¹ Dr. Oxenham irretrievably commits himself to the statement which he has made in his book regarding Maldonatus, and declares once again that this "ultramontane Jesuit doctor acknowledges that three of the greatest doctors of antiquity—Origen, Chrysostom, and Augustine—every one of them differs from modern Romanists,”¹ and that Maldonatus “conclusively refutes the Papal assertions as to the first text on which they rely.”² Now, I pointed out in my letter that Dr. Oxenham had suppressed the evidence, and I will endeavour to make this clear to the impartial reader. What are the facts? What does Maldonatus really say of the Fathers in connection with the text of S. Matthew?

¹ See Preface.

It is undoubtedly true that Maldonatus begins his commentary with the words quoted by Dr. Oxenham, and that he recalls the fact that some of the Fathers, besides the literal interpretation which they give elsewhere,³ do interpret the words “super hanc petram” to mean “upon this faith of Peter, or upon this confession of faith by Peter, with which thou hast acknowledged Me to be the Son of God.” One of S. Augustine’s readings of the text is also given by Maldonatus, and one of Origen’s. But here Dr. Oxenham stops short in his quotation from Maldonatus, and thus, as I have said, he suppresses the evidence and entirely misrepresents what Maldonatus really says of the Fathers. Let us see for ourselves. Dr. Oxenham asserts that Maldonatus “goes on, as we might expect, to argue that all those old Fathers were quite mistaken.”⁴ Maldonatus goes on to do nothing of the sort. For, in the very next sentence following upon the words quoted by Dr. Oxenham, Maldonatus goes on to write literally thus: "The Calvinists have laid hold of those interpretations taken in a sense different from their meaning, with greater eagerness than with love for truth. . . . We shall interpret the other Fathers a little further on."¹ I am afraid that in this instance Maldonatus would have classed Dr. Oxenham amongst the Calvinists, whom he immediately proceeds to confute at great length by expounding the usual Catholic and obvious interpretation of the text. It is the Calvinists, not those old Fathers, who, he argues, "are quite mistaken," though he does not think that the additional interpretations given by some of the Fathers are easy to reconcile with the literal meaning of the words in S. Matthew's Gospel. And Maldonatus quotes, in support of the well-known reading of the text, Clement of Rome, Hippolitus, Dyonisius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen, Epiphanius, Gregory Nazianzen, Basil, Ambrose, Leo, the Council of Chalcedon, Juvencus, and Psellus. And after that he immediately writes as follows:—"Finally, this was the mind of those very same Fathers who are brought forward as teaching the opposite." Maldonatus refers us, in support of this latter statement of his, to the writings of those very same Fathers, and, having quoted Origen, he names the other Fathers whom he had mentioned before in the passage translated by Dr. Oxenham. S. Hilary (lib. 6 de Trinit.) (in Psal. 131) (can. 16. in Matt.) CHRYSOSTOM. (hom. in Psal. 50.) Cyril. (lib. 2. in Joan. c. 12. 2.) and AUGUSTINE. (serm. 49.) Maldonatus then explains the Retractations of S. Augustine, and then concludes: "From this it is clear that the Fathers who said that 'super hanc petram' was to be interpreted as meaning 'upon this faith,' understood this interpretation differently to heretics. Hence the most correct interpretation seems to me to be that we should say that the Church was built upon the faith and upon the confession of Peter, i.e., upon Peter on account of his faith and confession, as all other authors have held. For we commonly make use of a like phraseology to indicate that the state is founded upon the faith of one man, i.e., upon one man on account of his faith. In the same way S. Ambrose (lib. de Resur. fide.) declared that the faith of Peter, and not his body, walked upon the waters, because, not his body, but his faith made it possible for him to walk upon the waters. Certainly, IT IS MANIFEST FROM THE WORDS OF THESE SAME AUTHORS (FATHERS) THAT THEY DID NOT WISH TO DENY, AS HERETICS DENY, THAT PETER WAS THE FOUNDATION OF THE CHURCH."¹ This is what Maldonatus writes regarding the Fathers mentioned by Dr. Oxenham, and I would ask whether, with the words of Maldonatus before our eyes, words which

¹ Page 26.² Page 32.³ See Introductory.⁴ Page 26.

¹ Mald. in loco.

¹ Mald. ibid.

Dr. Oxenham has suppressed, it is true that "Maldonatus acknowledges that all those great doctors of antiquity, and among them three of the greatest—Origen, Chrysostom, and Augustine—every one of them differs from modern Romanists,"¹ or that Maldonatus "conclusively refutes the Papal assertions as to the first text on which they rely."² Maldonatus says just the opposite. It is sad no doubt for Dr. Oxenham to find himself classed by Maldonatus among heretics, but he should not have suppressed the evidence, and made out that Maldonatus acknowledges or refutes that which he has neither acknowledged nor refuted. Dr. Oxenham does not like the word "suppress;" and he would rather have me describe his methods as "not reciting." Very well. That is certainly a nice way of putting it, and it is distinctly refreshing to find Dr. Oxenham preferring nice expressions, but the fact remains, and it is an awkward one, that Maldonatus cannot be quoted as admitting that those Fathers "every one of them differs from modern Romanists." And Dr. Oxenham can only uphold that statement by not reciting the evidence which was so much to the point. Like many other Catholic theologians, Maldonatus rightly argues that, whether you interpret "super hanc petram" as meaning "upon Peter" or "upon the faith of Peter," the conclusion is ever one and the same, namely—that upon him did Christ build the Church.

¹ Page 26.² Page 32.

2. Bellarmine is another "ultramontane" writer with whose authority Dr. Oxenham endeavours to bolster up his misrepresentation of the teaching of the Fathers upon the supremacy of S. Peter. Bellarmine, we are told,¹ "can quote nothing earlier than the eleventh century, except the suspicious evidence of some Popes in their own cause, of whom the earliest to speak distinctly is Pope Agatho, A.D. 680." Dr. Oxenham is speaking here of the text in S. Luke, "Simon . . . I have prayed for thee," etc. He resorts in this instance to the methods of which I have spoken in my introductory remarks, and therefore changes the whole position. His point was, and is, that all the venerable Fathers did not acknowledge the supremacy and infallibility of S. Peter; whereas here he is simply endeavouring to show that all the Fathers did not agree or prove that doctrine solely on the strength of the one text of S. Luke, a fact which the Pope never thought of denying in the Encyclical now under consideration. Turning, however, to what Dr. Oxenham here says, I would remark:—

1. That it is not a fact that Bellarmine quotes "nothing earlier than the eleventh century, except the suspicious evidence of some Popes in their own cause, the earliest of whom to speak distinctly is Pope Agatho, A.D. 680." For, Bellarmine refers to Leo the Great (serm. 3. de anniv. assumpt.), and

¹ Page 33.

Leo the Great lived two centuries before Pope Agatho. Nor can Dr. Oxenham pretend that this Pontiff, whom he describes as a "great champion"¹ of Papal rights, did not speak distinctly upon the prerogatives of S. Peter and of his successors. Not to mention other passages in his writings, in the very homily quoted by Bellarmine, Leo expounds most explicitly the doctrine of the supremacy of S. Peter, and after arguing from the texts of S. Matthew, he adds the texts of S. Luke, as further evidence, just as other Catholic writers usually do.

2. There is nothing suspicious in the evidence of Popes "in their own cause." As the Rev. Spencer Jones, the Anglican Rector of Batsford, points out,² "Human nature must be tempted to magnify its office; and it is natural and all for the best that it should have a strong bias in its favour; but it will at least say all that is to be said in its behalf; and on the other hand, where it is a question of government, the first impulse of a subject is to resist authority, and the next is to look about in search for respectable reasons for doing so." It would have been impossible for Leo or any other Pope to assert his authority as he did, and enforce it, an authority of universal jurisdiction, had not that authority been already known as legitimate throughout the world.

3. Bellarmine does not do more than just refer to the text of S. Luke, adding that Greek and Latin authors (Fathers), have thus interpreted it as further emphasising the supremacy of S. Peter. In the twenty-fifth chapter of his great work, De Romano Pontifice, a chapter which is headed, "Testimony of the Greek and Latin Fathers confirming the primacy of S. Peter," Bellarmine quotes all the Fathers and doctors of antiquity. The passage mentioned by Dr. Oxenham is but the eighth short paragraph of a chapter in which Bellarmine collects together a considerable number of proofs, as cumulative evidence of what he has already so fully established, and that paragraph is as follows:—"The 8th is in Luke xxii., where the Lord says Simon, Simon satan, etc. By which words the Lord most clearly shows that Peter was to be the Prince and Head of his brethren. Thus are they interpreted by Greek and Latin authors. Theophylactus, speaking of this passage, says:—'Because I hold thee to be the Prince of My disciples, after having wept over thy denial, confirm the others. This is suitable to thee, who, after Me, art the Rock and foundation of the Church.' Leo, in his third sermon, upon the anniversary of his elevation to the Pontificate, comments thus:—'The faith of Peter is specially prayed for, as though the condition of the rest would be more secure, provided the mind of Peter were not subdued.'"¹ Here the passage ends, and Bellarmine goes on to his 9th point. On the strength of this short reference, Dr. Oxenham asks us to believe that Bellarmine could not quote anything earlier than the eleventh century, and his name is brought forward by Dr. Oxenham in a book in which he has undertaken to show that "all the venerable Fathers" did not acknowledge the supremacy of Peter, and that at the beginning of the fifth century that doctrine was "simply unknown."¹

¹ Page 106.

² England and the Holy See, p. 169.

¹ Bellarmine. De Rom. Pontif, lib. I. cap. 20.

3—S. Augustine's Retractations

I have given elsewhere² the translation of the whole chapter of S. Augustine's Retractations, to which Dr. Oxenham attaches so much importance, and thus my readers will be in a position to judge whether Dr. Oxenham can reasonably make any use of it to strengthen his tottering arguments. "The witness of S. Augustine, even if it stood alone," writes Dr. Oxenham, "is sufficient to prove that Papal assertions as to this text (Matt xvi.) are false. . . . In this book he tells us that when he was young, before he was a Bishop, in explaining the words, 'On this Rock I will build my Church,' he had interpreted 'this Rock' to mean S. Peter; but that afterwards he had preferred (sic) another interpretation, and had in 'very many places' in his later writings expounded 'the Rock' to mean Christ Himself; for Christ was 'the Rock,' Whom Simon

¹ Page 40.

² Appendix.

confessing, as the whole Church confesses Him, was called Peter." And to this S. Augustine adds—"But of those two meanings, let the reader choose the more probable."¹ Now, a glance at the full text, which is not given in its entirety by Dr. Oxenham, shows us: (1) that S. Augustine does say in connection with the interpretation of this text, that he wrote upon the subject when he was a priest and before he was a Bishop. It is perfectly true that in his preface to the book of Retractations, S. Augustine does allude to what he wrote when he was young, as requiring correction; but it is also true that he adds in the same sentence that he does not assume even now that what he is writing will be without blemish. (2) He does not say that he prefers a different translation, but only suggests another. (3) He tells us that his great Master and Teacher, "the most blessed Ambrose," gives what Dr. Oxenham would call the "Romanist" interpretation, nor does S. Augustine reject it. He simply says:—"I know that later I have very often explained what our Lord said, 'super hanc petram,' as meaning upon Him Whom Peter confessed, saying, 'Thou art Christ, Son of the living God:' and thus Peter, named after the Rock, typified the Church, which was built upon the Rock and received the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. FOR IT WAS NOT SAID TO HIM, THOU ART 'PETRA,' BUT 'THOU ART PETRUS.' The Petra was Christ, Whom Simon confessing, as the whole Church confesses Him, was called Petrus. But of these two opinions let the reader choose the more probable."¹

¹ Page 28.

I might retort to Dr. Oxenham's reasoning,² that if S. Augustine had rejected the commonly accepted interpretation given by his great teacher S. Ambrose, he would not have left the reader his choice. Nor could he have left us that choice, in the sense in which Dr. Oxenham takes it, without leaving us free also to hold a doctrine which Dr. Oxenham declares to be an "amazing imposture,"³ especially as S. Augustine reminds us that Peter received the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. But, what is far more important, because it is the point at issue, whichever interpretation S. Augustine may have preferred, he does not retract, or suggest retracting the doctrine of the supremacy of S. Peter, a doctrine which he had repeatedly put forward in his writings, like the other Fathers before him, and in regard to which he leaves us no choice. For example, he writes:—"Who can be ignorant that the most blessed Peter is the first of the Apostles?"⁴ and "Of this Church Peter the Apostle, on account of the primacy of his apostleship, bore the character which represented the whole Church,"⁵ and "But I ought rather to fear being contumelious towards Peter. For who

¹ Retract. lib. I. c. 21.

² Pages 28-29.

³ Page 112.

⁴ Tract. 50 in Joan.

⁵ Tract. 124 in Joan.

knows not that that primacy (or pryncedom) of the Apostleship is to be preferred before any episcopate whatsoever? . . . the possession of that primacy is declared to have been the cause of Peter's having the keys."¹

But, it may be asked, how was it, then, that S. Augustine could think that such an interpretation of our Lord's words was in any way possible? The answer is given by S. Augustine himself, because, as he says, he was under the impression that "it was not said to him (Peter): Thou art Petra (rock), but Thou art Petrus (Peter)." And here we have the whole explanation. S. Augustine did not know Hebrew or Syriac, a fact which, it would seem, Dr. Oxenham has still to learn. The original text of our Lord's words in the Gospel of S. Matthew places beyond all doubt that our Lord did say precisely what S. Augustine thought He had not said, viz.: Thou art Petra (Kephaz) and upon this Petra (Kephaz),—using in both cases identically the same word. Had S. Augustine known this, it is obvious that he could not possibly have suggested his second reading of the text, because the very reason which he gives to justify it, falls to the ground. There is one conclusion left standing, however, and it is the conclusion that really matters, namely, that S. Augustine, like the other venerable Fathers, acknowledged and taught the supremacy of S. Peter.

¹ Enarr. in Ps. 108.

4—S. John Chrysostom

Few of the Fathers have spoken more explicitly upon the supremacy of S. Peter than S. John Chrysostom, and Dr. Oxenham would have been better advised had he left that great Father of the Greek Church alone. Speaking once again of the text in S. Luke xxii., Dr. Oxenham writes: "If we desire to know what was taught about this text by some of the old Fathers, we may read what S. Chrysostom, in the fourth century, taught. He sees in these words of Christ to Peter no gift of supremacy, or even of superiority, but just the contrary."¹ Dr. Oxenham refers us for this statement of his to S. Chrysostom's 82nd homily on Matt. xxvi. Before explaining the contents of that homily, let us consider Dr. Oxenham's assertion just as it stands: S. Chrysostom "sees in these words of Christ to Peter no gift of supremacy, or even of superiority, but just the contrary." Indeed! Well, then, will Dr. Oxenham kindly read S. Chrysostom's third homily upon the Acts of the Apostles? He will find matter for reflection there, in the following passage: "And in those days, Peter, rising up in the midst of the disciples, said, Both as being ardent, and as having had entrusted to him by Christ the flock; as the first of the choir, he always is the first to begin the discourse. Lo! there were a hundred and twenty; and he asks for one out of the whole multitude. Justly; he has the first authority in the matter, as having had all entrusted to him. FOR TO HIM CHRIST SAID, AND THOU BEING CONVERTED, CONFIRM THY BRETHREN." I fancy that the reader will conclude with me that Dr. Oxenham's statement is plainly false, and that S. Chrysostom does see in those very words of Christ to Peter a gift of supremacy, or of superiority, and not just the contrary.

¹ Page 33.

But let us turn to the 82nd homily, from which Dr. Oxenham endeavours to draw an argument against Papal claims. In that homily S. Chrysostom comments upon the events which immediately preceded our Lord's Passion, and expounds various points of Christian doctrine, in the course of which commentary, when he mentions Peter, he calls him the "head" or "summit" of the Apostles. He then dwells at length upon Peter's pride and arrogance in contradicting our Blessed Lord, and is all intent upon teaching the necessity of humility, just as a "modern Papalist" would do, and does constantly to-day, without considering such a commentary "fatal to modern Papal claims."¹ Far from questioning for a moment the supremacy and superior position of S. Peter, which he so repeatedly brings forward, far from seeing "just the contrary" in these words of our Lord, S. Chrysostom proceeds to give, in the very next sentence that follows upon Dr. Oxenham's quotation,¹ this most explicit teaching: "Why did He (Christ) not say, I have forgiven, but rather, I have prayed? Because He speaks more humbly as He is about to go to His Passion, in order to manifest His Humanity. For He Who founded and safeguarded the Church upon his (Peter's) confession, so that no danger, nor death itself could overcome him; Who had given to him (Peter) the Keys of the kingdom of heaven, and bestowed upon him such great power, and yet needed not to pray for all these things—how much less should He have needed to pray in this instance? For, indeed, with the greatest authority did He say, I will build my Church [upon thee], and I will give to thee the Keys of the kingdom of heaven. What necessity, then, was there of prayer in order to sustain the troubled soul of one man? For the reason which we have already ex-

¹ Page 34.

¹ "Hear," writes S. Chrysostom, "what He saith: 'I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not.' For this He said, sharply reproving him, and showing that his fall was more grievous than that of the rest, and needed more help. For the matters of blame were two—both that he contradicted his Lord and that he set himself before the others; and a third fault, namely, that he attributed all to himself. To cure these things, the Lord suffered the fall to take place; and for this cause also, turning from the others, Christ addresses Himself earnestly to Peter, saying, 'Simon! Simon! Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat'—that is, that he may trouble, confound, and tempt you—'but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not.' And why, if Satan desired all, did He not say concerning all, 'I have prayed for you?' Is it not quite plain that it is this, which I have mentioned before, that it is as reproving him, and showing that his fall was more grievous than that of the rest, that Christ directs His words to him." (Quotation by Dr. Oxenham, p. 34.)

plained, and on account of the weakness of His disciples, who as yet had not an entirely right estimation of Him." And then, after speaking once more of S. Peter's pride, S. Chrysostom concludes with a lesson on humility, and says: "For this reason did He permit the Chief of His Apostles to fall, rendering him more humble, and leading him to greater love. For he is more loved, He said, to whom more is forgiven."¹ These words of S. Chrysostom are fatal to Dr. Oxenham's argument, and he has "not recited" them, though they follow immediately upon the passage which he has quoted. Yes, Dr. Oxenham would have done better to leave S. Chrysostom alone. That great Father has spoken too emphatically to admit of his teaching being questioned. In his Homilies on Penance, he writes: "Peter himself, the Chief of the Apostles, the first in the Church, the friend of Christ . . . this very Peter;—and when I name Peter, I name that unbroken rock, that firm foundation, the great Apostle, the first of the disciples."² "And yet after so great an evil [the denial], He again raised him to his former honour, and entrusted to his hand the primacy over the universal Church."³ And again, not to quote other passages,⁴ in his homily on the parable of the Talents, S. Chrysostom calls S. Peter "the leader of the choir of the Apostles, the mouth

¹ Hom. 82, on S. Matt. xxvi.

² Hom. 3, de Pœn.

³ Hom. 5, de Pœn.

⁴ See my quotation on p. 35.

of the disciples, the pillar of the Church, the buttress of the faith, the foundation of the confession, the fisherman of the universe." May we not name S. Chrysostom, therefore, as one of the Fathers who taught the supremacy of S. Peter?

Even in another passage quoted by Dr. Oxenham, S. Chrysostom's words are significant enough, though Dr. Oxenham endeavours to make him speak only of a first "place," forgetting that the Greek word προστασία is derived from προστάτης (he who presides) and προίσταμαι (to preside, to govern), and is generally translated by the words "presidency," "direction," "government."

5—S. Cyril of Alexandria

Little need be said here of the mind and teaching of this Father of the Church, with whose great name Dr. Oxenham strives to dazzle the unwary reader, for Dr. Oxenham gives his own case away in the very text which he quotes, though he does his best to force us to adopt his much-desired conclusion. "If any one asks for what cause Christ asked Simon only, though the other disciples were present, and what he means by 'Feed My lambs' and the like we answer that S. Peter, with the other disciples, had been already chosen to the Apostleship; but because meanwhile Peter had fallen . . . He now heals him that was sick, and exacts a threefold confession in place of his triple denial, contrasting the former with the latter, and compensating the fault with the correction. For, from what our Lord says, 'Feed My lambs,' a renewal of the Apostolate already delivered to him is considered to have been made, which presently absolves the disgrace of his sin, and blots out the perplexity of his human infirmity."

Let us accept this translation as it is given by Dr. Oxenham. It is false to say that S. Cyril does not teach that our Lord spoke these words to S. Peter alone, "not as conferring on him any sort of pre-eminence over others."¹ This is Dr. Oxenham's opinion, not the teaching of S. Cyril. Read over the text and see how S. Cyril tells us that Peter was reinstated by a "renewal of the Apostolate." Exactly so; but not reinstated by halves, or with a diminution of what he had already been promised, but reinstated in the Apostolate as Christ had described it and bestowed it, with its special prerogatives and powers, for it was the Apostolate which was Peter's, and he would not have been reinstated had it been diminished.

Now, what was the nature of this Apostolate given to Peter, according to the teaching of S. Cyril? He describes it himself elsewhere. Thus, in his commentary on S. John, he writes: "He (Christ) suffers him no longer to be called Simon, exercising authority and rule over him already as having become His own. But by a title suitable to the thing, He changed his name into Peter, from the word 'petra' (rock); for on him He was afterwards to found His Church."¹ When "afterwards," if not, according to the meaning of S. Cyril, precisely when Peter was reinstated and Christ said to him: Feed My lambs? And again that great Father writes: "They (the apostles) strove to learn through one, that pre-eminent one, Peter."² "And even the blessed Peter, though set over the holy disciples, says, Lord," etc.³ "If Peter himself, that Prince of the holy disciples, was upon one occasion scandalised," etc.⁴

¹ P. 39

We might multiply such quotations from the writings of S. Cyril, but surely his teaching is clear in the passages here mentioned.

PART III

ARGUMENTS FROM SCRIPTURE AGAINST THE SUPREMACY AND INFALLIBILITY

WE now come to deal with the latter portion of Dr. Oxenham's book, and first of all with what he is pleased to style the evidence which Holy Scripture affords against the belief in any supremacy or in-

¹ T. iv.

² Ib., lib. ix.

³ Ibid.

⁴ Ib., lib. xii.

fallibility.¹ He has proved to his own satisfaction that positive Scriptural evidence in support of S. Peter's supremacy and infallibility there is "absolutely none."² Here he proceeds to state that there is a considerable body of evidence tending to show that he (Peter) was not supreme nor infallible, confining himself to the evidence afforded by the Book of Acts and Epistles, because, he assures us, that to cite the passages in the life of S. Peter which are recorded in the Gospels is not fair.³ What a pity that he did not find out sooner that what he was doing up to this point was not fair. He would thus have spared himself, and us, considerable trouble.

(I.)

His first argument is based upon the text, "Ye shall be witnesses unto Me,"⁴ because in these words our Lord gave "no sort of superiority to one over another."⁵ What Dr. Oxenham can possibly prove from this text is beyond comprehension, except on the supposition that he fails to understand the Catholic doctrine concerning the Apostles, and their relative position to S. Peter. We have already explained that they all received their mission from Christ, and had world-wide powers; and we have also shown that every Catholic (Romanist) believes this, and that it does not in the least detract anything from the supremacy of S. Peter when that doctrine is properly understood.

¹ Page 43.² Page 44.³ Pages 44, 45.⁴ Acts i. 8.⁵ Page 45.

Even Dr. Oxenham is obliged to confess that he finds "no positive proof" in this passage of the Book of Acts. "Meno male!" as Italians would say.

(II.)

The second argument brought forward by Dr. Oxenham is drawn from the events described in the Acts, in connection with the election of S. Matthias in the place of Judas, the traitor. "They appointed two. . . . But did the supreme and infallible head of the Church choose between these two and appoint the fittest?"¹ exclaims Dr. Oxenham. No; and why should he? What has infallibility got to do with choosing the fittest of these two candidates? And what is there here against the supremacy?

The question was one of special importance, and unique in character. An Apostle had to be elected, that is to say, one who received his mission directly from God. Hence, it became necessary that, as far as possible, God Himself should select the person. Accordingly, the Apostles have recourse to prayer and to a casting of lots. But who undertook the whole matter, which was of such importance? Who declared it to be necessary, and authoritatively placed it before the assembled brethren? No other than the Prince of the Apostles. Peter it was who rose up in the midst of the brethren and proved from Holy Scripture the necessity of substituting Judas. He it was who declared that it "must" be done. The Apostles unanimously accepted his declaration, and proceeded to the election. There were no claims of infallibility, nor could there be in such a matter, but there was an act of government on the part of the Prince of the Apostles. Dr. Oxenham does not think so, whereas his friend S. Chrysostom thinks as we do. Listen to the words of that great Father: "Both as fervent, and as one entrusted by Christ with the flock, and as the first of the choir, he ever first begins to speak. . . . But might not Peter by himself have elected? Certainly; but he does not so, that he may not seem partial." And, having spoken of the humility of S. Peter, S. Chrysostom points out that there was no abuse of power or proud exercise of authority, though authority there was: "Peter doing this with common consent, nothing with imperiousness, nothing with lordship. . . . He first acts on authority in the matter, as having himself all put into his hands, for to him Christ said: And thou, in thy turn, one day confirm thy brethren."¹ The successor of S. Peter would act, and does act, in the same way to-day in all matters of importance, whether of faith or of discipline.

¹ Page 46.

¹ Hom. 3 in Act.

(III.)

The institution of Deacons, strange to say, becomes an argument in Dr. Oxenham's hands against the supremacy of S. Peter, because it is written: "The twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them," and proposed that "seven men of honest report" should be appointed. The proposal "pleased the whole multitude, and they chose Stephen"¹ and the other six. This, we are told by Dr. Oxenham, is "very hard to reconcile with Papal claims."² Why? Dr. Oxenham does not say, and who can tell? The twelve Apostles, including Peter, decide to institute the Deacons. The Pope calls together a number of Bishops, and even others who are not Bishops, and together with them decides upon a question, and yet no one dreams of arguing that this is hard to reconcile with the supremacy; much less would any one think of doing so where the twelve Apostles are concerned. But this is Dr. Oxenham's manner of reasoning.

(IV.)

"Now, when the Apostles who were in Jerusalem had heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John"³ to confirm those who had already been baptised. "They were sent. . . . That was a strange way for the Apostles to deal with that exalted person who was their supreme and absolute ruler!"¹ So writes Dr. Oxenham. This latter exclamation of his amounts almost to a sneer against the person of S. Peter, which, to say the least, is unbecoming. In this fact of the two Apostles being "sent," Dr. Oxenham sees an argument against the supremacy of Peter. Had he considered the whole text of that chapter in the Book of Acts a little more carefully he would have discovered his mistake. For (1) S. Peter was among the senders, and hence he may be said to have sent himself, especially as he always took the lead. (2) There is no objection to those who are in a subordinate position expressing their wish that their superior should act in a given way, nor in their "sending" him. This is all the more intelligible where Apostles are concerned. Nations, before now, have "sent" their Sovereigns and Princes on important missions, without suggesting a doubt as regards their superiority. And to only mention instances taken from Holy Scripture, has Dr. Oxenham forgotten what we read in the Old Testament,² that the people of Israel "sent" Phinees, the son of Eleazar the priest, and ten princes with him, to the Rubenites? Will Dr. Oxenham question the position and authority of Phinees and of the ten Princes, because they were "sent"? Again, we read that Paul and Barnabas were sent to Jerusalem by the Antiochians to consult the Apostles.¹ Are we to conclude that Paul was their equal or their inferior, or not an Apostle because they sent him? (3) If Dr. Oxenham will refer to the whole narrative in the chapter of the Acts which he has mentioned, he will find that S. John is simply S. Peter's companion, and that he acts the second part. Peter it was who proclaimed the teaching, and he alone commands, judges, condemns, and finally inflicts punishment upon Simon Magus. Dr. Oxenham remarks: "Let us try to imagine an ecclesiastical assembly in mediæval or in modern Rome 'sending' the Pope and some other Bishop down to Naples, or elsewhere, to hold a confirmation."² Well, the idea is picturesque, but it is not inadmissible if Dr. Oxenham will also imagine the Pope in Italy with only a few Bishops round him to provide for all the needs of the Church. In such circumstances, the Pope might very easily be "sent" down to Naples, or elsewhere, to hold a confirmation, and when he got there he might condemn another Simon Magus. "S. Peter," says Dr. Oxenham, "appears to have gone to Samaria, when he was sent without exhibiting any consciousness that his dignity was injured."³ Yes, because his dignity was not injured, nor had S. Peter the proud and over-sensitive nature which Dr. Oxenham seems to think necessary in one who holds an exalted office. That is all.

¹ Acts vi.² Page 48.³ Acts viii. 14.

THE ACTS

59

¹ Page 49.

² Josue xxii. 13.

¹ Acts xv. 2.² Page 49.³ Ibid.

(v.)

We are now invited by Dr. Oxenham to see another argument against the supremacy and infallibility of S. Peter in the description of an event narrated in the Acts,¹ which, as a matter of fact, when it is not garbled and misrepresented, sets forth the position and authority of S. Peter in a most remarkable way. It is no other than the conversion of Cornelius and his household, an event, which, as Dr. Oxenham rightly remarks, was "a most notable" one, and "fraught with immense results; for it was the declaration that the religion of Jesus Christ was not a limited or racial religion, like the religion of the Jews, but that it was essentially, what it has ever professed to be, a Catholic religion, for all nations alike, for every country, and for every age."² He might have added, and therefore not a national branch religion.

Consistently with his method of "not reciting," Dr. Oxenham only recalls the events narrated in the eleventh chapter of the Acts, without a word upon what we are told in the tenth chapter, though that chapter is so essentially connected with all that follows in the eleventh chapter, that it cannot be separated from it. We must ask the reader to consider these two important chapters together, and see for themselves what they relate.

¹ Acts x., xi.² Page 50.

God sent an Angel to Cornelius, but Peter, and not the Angel, is chosen by God to declare the supremely important doctrine of the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles. He alone, who was the Rock, the Ruler, and the Shepherd of the whole flock, is selected by God to receive the great revelation, in preference to all the other Apostles, and in spite of their all having been commissioned to teach all nations. This of itself already constitutes a most striking proof of S. Peter's position. Peter in an "ecstasy of mind" receives the great vision, as it were, of a "great linen sheet let down by the four corners from heaven to the earth, wherein were all manner of four-footed beasts and creeping things of the earth and fowls of the air." "God hath shewed to me," he was able to say, "to call no man common or unclean."¹ Accordingly, Epiphanius, in the fourth century, writes that the mission of bringing the Gentiles into the Church was bestowed upon all the Apostles, "but most of all on blessed Peter."² Peter, to whom the care of the whole flock had been given, was thus told what the extension of Christ's fold was to be, embracing within its limits Jews and Gentiles, without distinction.

And here we come to Dr. Oxenham's extraordinary argument. On Peter's return to Jerusalem, "the Apostles and brethren who were in Judea, having heard that the Gentiles also had received the word of God . . . they that were of the circumcision contended with him.”¹ And we are told what they said. “Why didst thou go in to men uncircumcised and didst eat with them?” A very natural question, it would seem, for those to put, who as yet were not aware of the full design of God’s providence, as Peter now was. Dr. Oxenham concludes that those who contended with him were “evidently altogether unconscious that he was their supreme ruler, and infallible in all his judgments on matters of faith and morals.”² Does Dr. Oxenham hold, then, that the Apostles were not infallible in their judgments on matters of faith and morals, or deny that Peter was at all events one of the infallible Apostles, to say the least? It would appear so, by this remark. It is quite possible that those who were of the circumcision in those early days were unconscious of a great many things which they had yet to learn, but there is not the slightest evidence here against the supremacy and infallibility of S. Peter. When holy Job said: “If I did despise the cause of my manservant or of my maidservant, when they contended with me,”³ did he imply that his servants were his equals or “altogether unconscious” of the fact that he was their lord and master? S. Peter, in reply to the question addressed to him, proceeds at once to relate his great vision and to explain the revelation, and he does so with such authority that all “held their peace and glorified God, saying, God then has also to the Gentiles given repentance unto life.”¹ Dr. Oxenham discovers in this event a proof against the supremacy and infallibility of S. Peter, and says that he submitted his case to the assembly, as if their approval, and not his authority in declaring his vision, really settled the matter. A more foolish travesty of the facts narrated in the Book of Acts one could hardly conceive. And, awkwardly enough for Dr. Oxenham, here again is his friend, S. Chrysostom, contradicting his views. After stating that “not the Apostles, but those that were of the circumcision” contended with Peter, S. Chrysostom expresses at great length his admiration for S. Peter’s humility, bringing forward, as he does, God’s direct action in the matter and not his own, and then he exclaims: “See how he defends himself, and will not use his dignity as the teacher, for he knew that the more gently he spoke with them, the surer he was to win them.”² And the great S. Gregory thus comments upon the incident: “And yet the same first of the Apostles, filled with so great a grace of gifts, supported by so great a power of miracles, answers the complaint of the faithful by an appeal, not to authority, but to reason. . . . For if, when blamed by the faithful, he had considered the authority which he held in holy Church, he might have answered that the sheep entrusted to the shepherd should not venture to censure him. But if, in the complaint of the faithful, he had said anything of his own power, he would not have been the teacher of meekness. Therefore he quieted them with humble reason, and in the matter where he was blamed even cited witnesses. If, therefore, the Pastor of the Church, the Prince of the Apostles, having a singular power to do signs and miracles, did not disdain, when he was censured, humbly to render account, how much more ought we sinners, when blamed for anything, to disarm our censurers by a humble defence.”¹ Dr. Oxenham fails to see the difference between authority and the use of authority, and the lesson of Peter’s humility escapes him.

¹ Acts x.

² Hær. 28, 3.

¹ Acts xi.² Page 50.³ Job xxxi. 13.

¹ *Ib.*² In Act. Ap. hom. 24.

(VI.)

The Council of Jerusalem is the next notable event related in the Acts which affords Dr. Oxenham a proof, as he thinks, that S. Peter was neither supreme nor infallible. The matter under consideration is obviously connected with the point which we have just been discussing. The mere fact, however, of the assembling of a Council, constitutes, in Dr. Oxenham’s eyes, an argument against the supremacy and infallibility. Because S. Peter does not use his authority imperiously, and once more gives us an example of wisdom and humility, acting nevertheless with very great power, Dr. Oxenham concludes against the existence of Peter’s prerogatives. The Acts narrate that: “the Apostles and ancients assembled to consider of this matter.”¹ “But what was the good of all these men considering the matter,” exclaims Dr. Oxenham, “if one among them knew infallibly what ought to be done? And if, moreover, he was authorised and empowered as the Vicar of Christ to impose his supreme decision upon the whole Church?”² The answer is not difficult to give, and has already been suggested to us by S. Chrysostom in the previous instance—because the supremacy and infallibility of S. Peter do not imply that he, nor any of his successors, is to use his prerogatives like a tyrant, or after the manner of some magic talisman to be hurled at the Church on every occasion without reason, or without consultation with those who have a mission of teaching together with him.

¹ Lib. ix., Ep. 39.

But what are the facts, as they are described in the text of the Acts? Dr. Oxenham declares that S. James presided over the Council of Jerusalem.³ Where are his proofs for this statement? Nothing of the kind is said in the Book of Acts, and Dr. Oxenham is obliged to confess that “We are not told in the narrative of the Book of Acts the reason why S. James presided.”⁴ No, of course not, considering that we are not told that S. James presided at all, and that Dr. Oxenham has invented this for himself. To say that S. James must have presided because he was Bishop of Jerusalem, either then or later, is beside the point and simply to beg the whole question.

¹ Acts xv.² Page 53.³ Page 53.⁴ Page 54.

Now, the description of what took place at the Council of Jerusalem, as we read it in the Acts, is totally different to the one with which we are favoured by Dr. Oxenham. For we read there that S. Peter was the first to rise up and address the assembled brethren, who, as we may rightly presume, waited for him to speak. He proceeded forthwith to make the following most solemn declaration of his election by God to the privilege of receiving the Gentiles. Listen to his words: "Men brethren, you know that in former days God made choice among us that by my mouth the Gentiles should hear the word of the gospel, and believe. And God who knoweth the hearts," etc.¹ S. Peter therefore declares that God has already manifested what the decision is to be, and by his ministry. He accordingly goes on to exclaim with words full of power: "Now, therefore, why tempt you God to put a yoke upon the necks of the disciples, which neither our fathers or we have been able to bear? But by the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we believe to be saved, in like manner as they also."² And what was the result of these words of authority, upon the Jewish converts who felt so strongly in regard to the matter? The text tells us that "all the multitude held their peace." Most distressing it is for Dr. Oxenham, but unfortunately S. Chrysostom contradicts him once again. "How full of power," writes this great Father, "are the words (of Peter);

¹ Acts xv. 8.² Acts xv. 10, 11.

he says here what Paul has said at great length in the Epistle to the Romans. . . . The seeds of all this lie in Peter's discourse. . . . See, he first permits a discussion to arise in the Church, and then he speaks."¹ After S. Barnabas and S. Paul, S. James addresses the assembly, and how does he begin his argument? He immediately refers to Peter's words, not to the words of either Barnabas or Paul. "Simon," he says, "hath related how God first visited to take of the Gentiles a people to his name."² He thus emphasises all that Peter had declared God to have done "by his mouth." And then S. James expresses his own judgment in full conformity with Peter's declaration. Why should he not have done so? What is there inconsistent here with the true conception of Peter's office as Prince of the Apostles? S. James was his fellow-apostle. Though in union with, and in a measure dependent upon Peter, S. James was a teacher and a judge in Council, and he gave his judgment, just as every Bishop must do, and has done, in every Œcumenical Council under the supremacy of the Pope. It would appear from Dr. Oxenham's manner of reasoning that the head of an assembly, who takes the initiative and declares the course to be pursued by those who are sitting in judgment with him, loses his prerogatives by the mere fact of other judges being present and rising up to express their mind. For, it was his own sentence that S. James gave. Dr. Oxenham actually dares to change the words of Holy Writ and say that "S. James rose and gave the sentence of the Council."¹ That is absolutely contrary to the narrative in the Acts. The text distinctly asserts that S. James said: "Wherefore my sentence is——," or as we have it I judge. The SENTENCE of the COUNCIL is given much further on in verse 28, as follows: "For it hath seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us, to lay no further burden upon you than these necessary things: that you abstain from things sacrificed to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication, from which things keeping yourselves, you shall do well. Fare ye well." This is the Decree and Judgment of the Council of Jerūsalem, with Peter at its head; a decree common to all judges in the category in which each one is placed. Nor may one travesty the narrative by saying that it implies that all the judges were of equal rank. Therefore is it that S. Jerome, in the fourth century, writes that Peter "used his wonted freedom, and that the Apostle James followed his sentence, and all the ancients at once acceded to it, and the decree was drawn up on his wording."²

¹ Hom. 32.² v. 14.

To be logical, Dr. Oxenham must go further and say that the Ancients and Brethren had the same rank and authority as the Apostles, because the decree of the Council of Jerusalem was issued as the decree of "the Apostles, Elders, and Brethren." Will he dare to say this? We hardly think so. And yet when he is intent upon inveighing against the supremacy of S. Peter, he does not shrink from such reasoning.

¹ Page 54.

² Ep. 75 int. August.

(VII.)

The case of Ananias and Saphira, and S. Peter's remarkable and most significant exercise of authority in connection with the sin of those two unfortunate souls is not mentioned by Dr. Oxenham, but he, of course, lays hold, with much eagerness, of the famous incident recorded in the Epistle to the Galatians, when S. Paul rebuked S. Peter. It was not likely that Dr. Oxenham would fail to try and make capital out of that notable event, in support of his contention, as so many Protestants have done before him, wresting the text "as they do also the other Scriptures to their own destruction."¹ Dr. Oxenham, as we have remarked before,² gives proof here that he has not understood the nature of the prerogative of infallibility which is claimed for S. Peter and for his successors, and very little, too, of the supremacy. Had he understood what we mean by infallibility, he could never have written the following sentence: "For whether S. Peter's fault on this occasion were one 'of faith' or 'of fact,' whether his fault were 'light and venial' or not, the fact remains that he was in the wrong, that S. Paul withstood him before the Church, and openly rebuked him.”¹ Now, we have explained elsewhere what is meant by infallibility, and the reader will see at a glance that in order to prove anything against this prerogative of S. Peter, the point which Dr. Oxenham had to establish, was precisely that S. Peter’s fault on that occasion was one “of faith.” That is the kernel of the whole question, unless the true meaning of infallibility, as taught by Catholics, is misrepresented and made to signify something very different to that which is really claimed for S. Peter and for his successors. Dr. Oxenham has not proved the point that concerns us in this controversy, and he could not do so.

¹ 2 Pet. iii., 16.

² See Introductory chapter.

But what was the reason of S. Paul’s rebuke and the subject of discussion? The facts are clearly before us. S. Peter was blamed by S. Paul for what he did, and not for what he taught. He was rebuked because “before that some came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles, but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them who were of the circumcision.”² It was therefore not his faith, but his manner of acting which S. Paul thought it necessary to censure under the circumstances. Precisely because Peter occupied such a pre-eminent position, his behaviour influenced others, and influenced them in a way which might hamper the conversion of the Gentiles, with whom S. Paul was so especially dealing. And it was on account of S.

¹ Page 58.

² Gal. ii. 12.

Peter's pre-eminent position that S. Paul attached such great importance to S. Peter's behaviour. S. Chrysostom tells Dr. Oxenham this: "If it had been another Peter," he writes, "his change would not have had such power as to draw the rest of the Jews with him. For he did not exhort or advise, but merely dissembled and separated himself, and that dissembling and separation had power to draw after him all the disciples, on account of the dignity of his person."¹ The Jewish practices, that were not incompatible with the New Law, were not forbidden, and were permitted to the Jewish converts, who clung very naturally to many of their old traditions. On the other hand, they constituted a yoke which was not to be imposed upon the Gentiles, as S. Peter, speaking of the doctrinal principle, had clearly declared at the Council of Jerusalem. Whether or not S. Peter was really at fault in acting in two different ways, according to his manner of appreciating the circumstances, the fact is that when he was with the Gentiles, "before that some came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles,"² and when those Jews did come from James, he feared displeasing or scandalising them, and acted according to their custom, a custom which, presumably, was allowed by S. James. Has Dr. Oxenham forgotten that S. Paul, when he thought that the circumstances justified his doing so, acted precisely on the same principle? Let Dr. Oxenham consider the two texts which I have here placed side by side.

¹ Hom. in loc.

² Gal. ii. 12.

Galatians ii. 3.

But neither Titus, who was with me, being a gentile, was compelled to be circumcised.

Acts xvi. 3.

And taking him (Timothy) he circumcised him, because of the Jews who were in those places. For they all knew that his father was a gentile.

Here we have S. Paul, out of regard for the Jews, not merely eating according to the Jewish custom, but actually obliging his disciple Timothy to be circumcised, because he was the "son of a Jewish woman that believed, but his father was a Gentile." The fact of Timothy's father being a Gentile, and his mother a Jewish convert was not sufficient in S. Paul's eyes to dispense with the rite of circumcision, "because of the Jews who were in those places." Whereas, in other circumstances, he did not compel Titus to be circumcised. It was on the same principle that S. Peter acted in Antioch, eating with the Gentiles, in one instance, and separating himself in the other. S. Paul, however, did not consider that the circumstances at Antioch were such as to allow of Peter acting in this way. The two Apostles therefore took a different view of those circumstances. Hence the rebuke. But what has this to do with infallibility? And as to S. Peter's supremacy, a little attention suffices to show that the whole tenor of S. Paul's argument to the Galatians, who had calumniated him, constitutes a fresh indication of the supremacy which he acknow-